

Overview

Think of all the different beliefs you hold about various matters. How many of these, if any, constitute genuine knowledge rather than mere opinion? What does this distinction amount to and why is it important? To what extent do the standards for what counts as knowledge depend on context? Can you know something without knowing that you know it? What makes a belief justified or reasonable? Is it ever reasonable to hold a belief if you have no evidence to support it? Is it ever reasonable to believe something that couldn't possibly be true? These are some of the central questions in epistemology—the philosophical study of the nature, extent, and value, of knowledge and justified belief. In this course we will explore these and related questions using both historical and contemporary sources. Epistemological questions crop up absolutely everywhere—in science, the humanities, politics, religion, and everyday life—and this course will give you the tools to tackle such questions wherever you find them.

The required weekly reading will consist in one or two accessible articles or book chapters. A large proportion of this material will be drawn from the following introductory textbook, abbreviated 'WTK' in the remainder of this document:

- Pritchard, D. 2014: What Is This Thing Called Knowledge? (3rd Edition). NY: Routledge.

It is available to borrow from the library in ebook format (here; also here, but in 2nd edition). In addition, it is highly recommended that you attempt to engage with some additional material, after working your way through the relevant set reading. For your convenience, most of the relevant readings will be provided in a pdf-format course reader. The remainder is available freely online, following the links provided.
